Papua New Guinea's principal city and capital is Port Moresby, situated halfway along the southern coastline on a superb natural harbor in Central Province. The people are from two distinct backgrounds: The Motu are coastal seafaring people and have a distinct Polynesian appearance, suggesting they migrated from Pacific island communities. On the other hand, the Koitabu are inland village people, hunters and farmers who traded peacefully with the Motu.

Central Province covers an area of 29,940 square kilometers. It is a region of stark contrast – the narrow coastal fringe sweeps dramatically into the foothills and 4000meter heights of the Owen Stanley Range, which divides the Province from its northern neighbors.

Port Moresby the birthplace of European influence, Port Moresby was named after Captain John Moresby, who mapped the southern coastline in 1873. It later became the capital of British New Guinea, and then Papua New Guinea after independence in 1975.

Port Moresby – or “Moresby” as it is popularly known – is a bustling cosmopolitan city of over 200,000 people. Rich in cultural diversity, the city has the country’s largest foreign community and counts among its citizens people from almost every tribal group in the land. The center of the city is on a peninsula at the entrance to Fairfax Harbor, where the docks and business district are located. Nearby Paga Hill is a favorite city lookout spot among visitors.

Port Moresby is a “spread out” city, extending along the coastal bays and back into the hills. Hanuabada is the original Motuan settlement stilt village located close to the city center. Although once destroyed by fire, the houses have been rebuilt to retain some of the character of Mountain tradition.

The infamous Kokoda Trail is within striking distance of Port Moresby, and is a main attraction. From popular Ela Beach is the city, the shoreline runs up to Koki Bay, a Market attracts traders and bargain hunters every day, but on the weekends it is crowned with stalls offering fresh fruit, vegetables and seafood.

Port Moresby is a fascinating blend of the old and the new. The National Parliament building exemplifies the striking harmony of modern architecture and traditional design. The National Museum and Art Gallery exhibits cultural features of Papua New Guinea’s complex and varied tribal lifestyles.

Port Moresby is the hub for most Papua New Guinea air travel. With a staggering 466 airfield scattered throughout the efficiency of its domestic flight network.

Jackson’s International Airport has established Port Moresby as the gateway to Papua New Guinea.

Variarata National Park is a spectacular natural mountain region providing excellent views of Port Moresby and the coastline.

Wildlife and native flora are plentiful and provide photographers with an opportunity to test their skills. West of Port Moresby the Hiritano Highway connects to Bereina, home of the colorful Mekeo people who are renowned for their impressive dancing displays and striking costumes.
